

How Could Global Crises Be Leveraged to Advance the Prophesied One-World Government?

Sixbert SANGWA • December 04, 2024

When a magician waves his hand and says, "this is where the magic is happening," the real trick is actually happening somewhere else. This principle of misdirection, a basic concept of magic, applies to how the idea of a one-world government, long seen as speculative, has gained increasing relevance amid global crises. The topic is now openly discussed, with global leaders frequently speaking about a potential new global order. Various terms are used to describe this concept—global order, globalization, multinational cooperation, great reset, and global stakeholder cooperation, among others. A significant development was the 2023 UN Summit of the Future, which approved the "Pact for the Future," a framework that extends considerable authority over the UN. This framework, as discussed earlier, has laid groundwork for global governance that could be activated during potential crises through a global emergency platform—whether it's a climate emergency, pandemic, epidemic, financial crisis, political upheaval, or other worldwide lockdown scenarios. Could this be where the magic lies? As Christians, understanding the spiritual implications of such a shift is vital, particularly in light of biblical prophecy. Could these developments signal the fulfillment of warnings about the rise of a one-world system under the Antichrist? This article briefly explores the political, social, and spiritual dimensions of these questions, drawing insights from Scripture and current events.

The Rise of Global Crises and Centralized Power

Globalists are increasingly seen as leaders navigating through global crises, but opinions seem to diverge on their methods. Some globalists seem to be lining toward a rapid, decisive action, ostensibly to address urgent challenges, though critics argue these swift responses often serve as pretexts for expanding control and surveillance over populations. The COVID-19 pandemic exemplified how emergency measures could potentially be used to implement broader agendas affecting personal freedoms (WEF, 2019). Conversely, others prefer a more gradual approach, which some analysts view as a strategic method to normalize significant societal changes over time. This methodical strategy, while appearing more measured, raises concerns about the subtle erosion of national sovereignty and civil liberties under the guise of necessary reforms. As global challenges like climate change and economic instability persist, the tension between these approaches continues to shape international governance debates.

These differing strategies highlight fundamental questions about the effectiveness and ethics of global governance. As globalism evolves, particularly in relation to the Fourth Industrial Revolution, critics contend that the neoliberal agenda weakens state authority and loses touch with citizens' needs. This disconnect has increased skepticism toward globalist motives, with many seeing them as a potential threat to national sovereignty. As global challenges persist, the need for effective leadership becomes increasingly critical.

Recent years have seen an unprecedented convergence of crises. Devastating hurricanes, financial instability, and widespread societal unrest underscore the fragility of human institutions. These challenges have provided fertile ground for global organizations like the United Nations (UN) and the World Health Organization (WHO) to expand their influence. The UN's "2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development," for instance, claims to address issues like poverty, inequality, and environmental sustainability. However, critics argue that these initiatives mask a deeper agenda of centralized control, stripping nations of their sovereignty and individuals of their God-given freedoms (UN, 2015).

The consolidation of power under global entities has accelerated dramatically. In September 2023, the UN held a "Summit for the Future" which produced an intergovernmentally negotiated "Pact for the Future" with ambitious plans for transforming global governance. By approving this, world leaders seek to facilitate the evolution of the UN from an international cooperative body to an international governing body. These powers would be triggered by any one of a number of so-called global emergencies, whether it was a so-called climate emergency, a health emergency, a cyber emergency, or a gun violence emergency, whatever that's supposed to be a financial emergency or whatever they deem appropriate. This development represents a significant expansion of authority beyond even the powers being sought by its subordinate agency, the WHO. The WHO's pandemic treaties and international health regulations already grant it considerable authority to dictate national policies during health crises. Such measures, while ostensibly aimed at protecting public health, raise serious concerns about surveillance, censorship, and the erosion of individual liberties. These developments align disturbingly with the prophecy of Revelation 13:7, which speaks of a global authority having power over "every tribe, people, language, and nation" (Revelation 13:7).

Implication of the Agenda 2030

"Transforming our World: The 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development" reveals concerning contradictions when carefully analyzed. While it makes sweeping claims about eliminating poverty and sustaining the world, reading between the lines suggests a move toward total government control. For instance, they state: "We are committed to achieving sustainable development in its three dimensions—economic, social and environmental—in a balanced and integrated manner." This push for "sustainable development" in economics implies extensive control over the economy, which would effectively end free enterprise.

The agenda clearly aims to transform society. Since any government reflects its underlying society, changing the society inevitably changes the government. This strategy aligns with secret society doctrines that influenced Karl Marx—he, like other illuminated figures throughout history, recognized that society had to change fundamentally to implement socialism and communism (or a new world order) successfully.

The UN's approach to rights fundamentally differs from Christian principles. The Christian system, like that of the United States, is founded on God-given rights that no government can legitimately revoke. In contrast, the UN's Charter and Universal Declaration of Human Rights position the UN itself as both the grantor and guarantor of rights. Consider Article 18 of the Universal Declaration: while it declares everyone's right to freedom of thought, conscience, and religion, it then subjects these freedoms to "limitations prescribed by law." (see page 5, last paragraph). This stands in stark contrast to the U.S. Bill of Rights, which explicitly prohibits government interference with fundamental rights.

The agenda's economic vision is plainly socialistic, stating that prosperity "will only be possible if wealth is shared and income inequality is addressed." Behind its vague, appealing language lies an agenda for comprehensive control. Consider Article 29's puzzling statement about "recognizing the positive contribution of migrants for inclusive growth and sustainable development." This seemingly disconnected reference to migration reveals a deeper strategy: by promoting unrestricted movement across borders, the UN appears to be working toward dissolving distinct national societies into one global society under UN control.

The Spiritual Battle Behind Political Agendas

At its core, the push for global governance is not merely political but deeply spiritual. Scripture teaches that God grants rights and freedoms to humanity, rights that no government can legitimately revoke (Galatians 5:1). In contrast, the UN's Universal Declaration of Human Rights posits that freedoms are granted by human authorities, subject to regulation. This subtle yet profound shift in worldview reflects a departure from Judeo-Christian principles and an embrace of human-centered governance.

Karl Marx, whose ideas undergird much of modern socialism and communism, understood that societal transformation was essential for political revolution. The UN's agenda echoes this strategy, promoting "sustainable development" in economic, social, and environmental dimensions. While these goals may appear noble, they carry the implication of total control over economic systems, societal norms, and environmental practices—a system reminiscent of the Beast's dominion described in Revelation 13:16-17.

The Role of Misdirection in Global Deception

One hallmark of spiritual deception is misdirection—drawing attention to one issue while advancing a hidden agenda elsewhere. Politicians and media outlets often focus on immediate crises, such as natural disasters or financial instability, while sidelining discussions about the long-term implications of treaties and policies. This tactic resembles the work of a magician, who distracts the audience with one hand while performing the trick with the other. As Christians, we are called to discern the signs of the times and recognize when such strategies are at play (Matthew 24:4-5).

For instance, while public attention is directed toward immediate challenges, the UN continues to negotiate agreements that could transform it from an international cooperative body into a governing authority with broad powers. These developments receive little media coverage, yet they have profound implications for national sovereignty and individual freedoms.

The Biblical Perspective on Sovereignty and Freedom

The Bible emphasizes that true freedom comes from God, not human institutions. Jesus declared, "If the Son sets you free, you really will be free" (John 8:36). This freedom is both spiritual and practical, rooted in the belief that individuals are accountable to God alone. In contrast, the move toward a one-world government reflects a humanistic philosophy that seeks to usurp God's authority. Prophecy warns that such a system will ultimately pave the way for the Antichrist, a figure who will deceive the nations and demand allegiance. Revelation 13:4 describes the world marveling at the Beast, saying, "Who is like the beast? Who is able to wage war against it?". This passage serves as a sobering reminder of the spiritual stakes involved in the current push for global governance.

What Can Christians Do? Faced with these challenges, Christians must remain vigilant, prayerful, and informed. The Apostle Paul exhorted believers to "test all things" and "hold on to what is good" (1 Thessalonians 5:21). This includes critically evaluating policies and initiatives that may appear beneficial on the surface but have deeper, more concerning implications. Moreover, believers are called to shine as "lights in the world" (Philippians 2:15), exposing darkness and pointing others to the hope found in Christ. By sharing the truth in love, we can challenge deception and encourage others to seek wisdom and understanding.

Conclusion

The convergence of global crises and the push for centralized governance are not random developments but appear to be part of a calculated strategy by global elites. Recent global crises seem to have served as test cases for more extensive control measures planned from 2025 onward, including engineered diseases, climate-related emergencies, and potential global conflicts. The UN's "Pact for the Future" has established a framework where any declared global emergency can trigger a centralized governance platform, effectively suspending national sovereignty and enabling UN control. While these developments may cause alarm, they align with biblical prophecies and remind us of God's ultimate sovereignty. Importantly, the Antichrist—described as the beast emerging from the sea of global chaos—will emerge as the leader of this global government.

As these prophetic events unfold before our eyes, we must remain vigilant and prepared, like the wise virgins with their lamps filled with oil (Matthew 25:1-13). The deepening night of tribulation approaches, and our Bridegroom could call us home at any moment. As we navigate these challenging times, let us remain anchored in the truth of God's Word, discerning the signs of the times, and standing firm in the faith. Only in Christ can we find true refuge, freedom, peace, and hope amid these global transformations.
